A new large scale mixed-media sculpture by Indo-Caribbean artist Suchitra Mattai entitled Re-Union, 2023, reflects on the complex layers that constitute one's identity. Made of braided and woven saris from both India and the United States, the work depicts "twin" girls who have found and made peace with one another, offering empathy by recognizing oneself in the other. The artist alludes to the longstanding practice of transforming discarded scraps into braided rugs, a culturally rich tradition that links American and diasporic communities while remaining rooted in the artist's South Asian and Caribbean heritage.

During a research trip to the National Museum of the American Indian in Washington, D.C., Wendy Red Star encountered a “horse getting” medicine bundle that belonged to her 18th century ancestor, Green Skin. This collection of special personal items empowered Green Skin to take horses, beloved and essential animals of the Great Plains, from neighboring tribes. Anthropologists have called this horse “stealing” or horse “capturing,” words that reflect a colonized notion of individualized property. As explained by Red Star, horse “getting” better approximates an Apsáalooke world view in which a horse carries far more cultural significance than its economic value.
